The Bel Naramin

In the beginning the world was covered in abominable wetness glistening and seductive like the slick dripping between a woman's thighs In the beginning, the world was eager, hungry and sought enjoyment above all else In the beginning the corrupted reigned, and the honour of men like virtue was yet to be learned, and man and beast laid in the field together as equals

And the great slippery demons of the vast ocean sea took whomever they wanted as their servants for the eyes of all to see they desecrated them under the prayers of their elders they desecrated them and gave nothing in return voices cried in the desert for fathers and mothers who knew not their children or for anyone who would listen.

And the desert answered, far long ago before the seas had fallen from the skies it had brought forth children the men of sand and dust and it was these children, lost but much beloved that the ocean sea, and the hunger of its denizens was taking for itself

How mighty reared the breath of the desert that night!

How harsh the laughter of the desert spirits and of the Jfrit that abide there

Far in its Rage, awakened from its slumber did strike out Umbek dl Tayif

Breath of the Desert

Fate of All Men

How its mighty Sands did shift

And the ocean boiled with desert heat how the unfaithful perished and the bones of the beasts that once ruled the deep became the Khim-dlgar

But in the shining white radiance

The Father's House of Worship

For the blood already spilled

Oh — how does the desert avenge its sons?
